THANKSGIVING BREAK TIPS

Thanksgiving should be a time of relaxation, charity and joy. As we give thanks we should consider how much we have and also how much the environment gives to us. Here's some tips for a more sustainable Thanksgiving break.

- Power down and unplug your lights and electronics before leaving for break.
- Consider local, organic, seasonal or vegetarian foods for a lower impact holiday feast.
- Collect and eat holiday leftovers. Don't like leftovers? Send food home with family and friends.
- Carpool or take alternative transportation to holiday events.
- Avoid disposable plates and utensils.
- Donate items to your local food bank or shelter to share Thanksgiving with another family.

Go Green Fact of the Month

A recent study found that the tiny spills that occur at the pump can add up to over 300 gallons of fuel spilled over a decade. Be mindful at the pump and avoid spillage that can harm waterways, soils and human health. Full story here.

Sustainability and Justice

With the Govan's farmers market closing up shop for the winter, it's a good time to reflect on the market's impact on food access in our neighborhood. 1 in 5 people in Baltimore live in a food desert, areas characterized by low car ownership, fewer fresh food vendors and lower incomes. Markets like Govans improve sustainability, but they also improve access to fresh, healthy and affordable food, which can have many benefits for health and wellness, student performance and the overall prosperity of a neighborhood and its residents. Learn more here.

ECO DIY Project of the Month

Veggie Turkey Platter

Everyone will love this adorable veggie platter. See if you can substitute local, organic and seasonal produce to make it more sustainable.
